Preface

THE NEWSPAPER in America occupies a singular place in our civilization. With the church, school, and general store, it has served as arbiter of men and events; it uniquely serves as scribe to the passing scene. Its value as a primary source for social history has been obscured by such faults as nostrum promotion, syndicated columns, and inaccurate reporting. But for thousands of lonely communities, untouched by greatness or importance, the local newspaper is the best and only historical record.

The fourth estate in America was of decidedly British antecedents, was nurtured in provincialism, and matured in the cult of editorial personality. America's first newspaper was established in Boston on April 24, 1704, and during the eighteenth century the institution spread throughout the colonies. But it was only after the American Revolution that this urban institution began to appear in the smaller towns, marking the beginnings of the country weekly.

The weekly was the pioneer of the journalistic family, and it traveled light as it moved west. Its garb was a four-page format until well after 1865, when mechanical improvements and presumptions to precedence inflated them to eight pages. Their layouts were monotonously similar: the first page was devoted to advertising and ponderous attempts to cultivate literary taste; biased editorials and slanted news of national politics appeared on the second page; the third page was reserved for local gossip and legal notices; the entire fourth page was covered with advertising.

The westward expansion of the press depended only on the establishment of mail routes as lines of communication with the East. A pretension to culture and stability, the newspaper frequently appeared on the raw edge of the frontier before it was economically justified. The pattern of premature establishment—and rapid failure—was repeated across the entire West under the stimulus of improved communications and local pride.

Except for papers of the metropolitan areas, the American press developed by multiplication of titles and constriction of circulation. This growth was dictated by the explosion of population, the flood of immigration, and the expansion of democracy and public education. It was made possible by cheaper newspapers, technological advances, and a spirit of business enterprise with more vision than practicality. Wherever people settled—on lakes, at railroad junctions, or on rivers—the editor, his type, and his green eye shade were not far behind.

True to the pattern of earlier frontiers, newspapers in Wisconsin were not far behind the first settlers. The first printing press was brought into the territory from Detroit about 1826 by Albert G. Ellis. His initial effort to found a newspaper at Navarino, as Green Bay was then called, was premature. But in December, 1833, Ellis and John V. Suydam successfully launched the Green Bay Intelligencer. The prototype of Wisconsin newspapers was cast in the same mold as the innumerable weekly sheets struggling, with their proprietors, for a place in the American scene.

Two years after the establishment of the first paper in the territory, competition developed: a rival political group started a second newspaper in Green Bay. Though bitter enemies, both papers promoted settlement, statehood, and internal improvements for the area. Green Bay dreamed of becoming the terminus of an elaborate system of waterways connecting West and East. Both papers died with their dream.

The muddy village of Milwaukee caught the vision of destiny from the wavering flame in Green Bay. Solomon Juneau and Byron Kilbourn had each established a site for future greatness and a paper to promote their civic schemes. Kilbourn favored the west bank, Juneau the east side of the Milwaukee River. The journalistic agitation left the village no alternative but to grow up to the size of its press. In many other communities the activities of the two political parties, Whig and Democratic, resulted in the establishment of rival newspapers to represent each group where only one paper was economically justified. The country editor was often as concerned with politics and community promotion as with news reporting, and his editorials were a reflection of his politics.

The great wave of immigration in the 1840's washed into Wisconsin settlers from New York, New England, Scandinavia, and Germany. But whatever their origin, these immigrants brought with them a common belief in the efficacy of law, the gospel of social reform, and the doctrine of theoretical democracy. These volatile concepts were distilled into an ideological crusade against slavery, which predestined sectional crisis and made Wisconsin Republican.

The abolitionist crusade in Wisconsin was led by Sherman M. Booth, editor of the Waukesha American Freeman and later of the Milwaukee Free Democrat. With his fellow abolitionists Booth directed his agitation against the despised Fugitive Slave Law, and fate gave him legal immortality in the case of Ableman v. Booth.

In 1854 Joshua Glover, a fugitive slave from Missouri, was captured near Racine and brought to Milwaukee for return to his owner. Booth formed a committee to insure a fair hearing for Glover, but the ensuing mob took immediate action to free Glover from jail, and then aided his escape to Canada. Booth was arrested, tried, and convicted in the federal district court for conspiracy to thwart return of the slave. At this juncture the case became a test of constitutional supremacy when the Wisconsin Supreme Court overturned the federal conviction, declaring the Fugitive Slave Act unconstitutional. The federal Supreme Court, in turn, set aside the state infringement upon federal sovereignty. But neither sovereignty nor slavery could be maintained by judicial decree.

With the outbreak of the Civil War many papers suspended publication as their editors enlisted in the Union army. Those remaining behind continued publication under great difficulties. Material shortages and a war psychosis had a serious and lasting effect on the Northern press.

The War, and Ansel N. Kellogg of the Baraboo Republic, gave a new production technique to the weekly press which transformed its soul as well as its appearance. To overcome the inflated printing and reporting costs, Kellogg had the Madison Wisconsin State Journal print one side of his paper with national news. The sheets were then shipped to Baraboo where Kellogg ran off the opposite side with local news and advertising. The process of buying ready-made matter became common after the War; it marked the birth of the modern newspaper syndicate and the death of the personal weekly.

Kellogg's initial concept of stereotyped material was a child of convenience, but Andrew J. Aikens of the Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin refined it into a profitable business by the inclusion of advertising. By 1864 Aikens was supplying almost 300 weeklies and reaping a harvest of profits. After the War both Kellogg and Aikens founded national syndicates in Cincinnati and Chicago to distribute their "patent insides."

The Wisconsin press was practically unanimous in its ideological opposition to slavery and its political support of the Union in the dedicated days of 1861. But military reverses shattered the hope of an easy victory and tragic losses bred discontent. Some of the more strident voices in Wisconsin were George H. Paul of the Milwaukee Daily News and Marcus "Brick" Pomeroy of the La Crosse Democrat. During the early part of the War Pomeroy only mildly questioned its goals, but later he became the most famous of the Wisconsin "Copperheads." After the Emancipation Proclamation he visited the front with the Army of the Southwest and became convinced that the South could not be defeated in a war to free the slaves. Pomeroy urged a quick peace. Because of his defeatist views, he was banished from the battlefield by the commanding general.

Upon Pomeroy's return to La Crosse, he began writing articles violently opposing the War, emancipation, and Abraham Lincoln. His attacks culminated in the publication of Lincoln's picture with the caption, "The Widow-Maker of the 19th Century." He also composed an epitaph for the President:

BENEATH THIS TURF THE WIDOW-MAKER LIES,
LITTLE IN EVERYTHING, EXCEPT IN SIZE.

But Pomeroy did not speak for his state or his city. Local opposition to his paper grew, advertising dwindled, and circulation declined. Only swift action by local authorities preserved the newspaper office from mob violence. Pomeroy left the malevolence in La Crosse in 1868 to publish newspapers in Chicago and New York.

The popular appeal and intense drama of the War spawned a new brand of journalism and a new breed of correspondent. Battlefield copy brought home the War to the readers of even the most remote country weekly, and it shifted the emphasis from the editorial to the news columns. The graphic dispatches by Sylvanus Cadwallader, who covered Grant's army for the Milwaukee Daily News, set a new standard of journalism for Wisconsin.

The postwar adjustment to the new nationalism and expanding economy was flavored by the arrival of new waves of immigrants. In 1870 approximately half of the population of Wisconsin was foreign-born. Their conflicting traditions and aspirations begot a sociological epic of integration; its journalistic aspect was the foreign language press. The immigrant newspaper successfully accomplished the difficult feat of perpetuating national traditionalism while helping to Americanize its patron. In fact, it served its purpose so well that in one generation it destroyed its reason for being.

The German language papers were the most numerous and most skillfully edited of the foreign press in America. Beginning with the Milwaukee Wiskonsin-Banner in 1844, some 220 German papers have been published in Wisconsin. The number of papers and their geographical distribution suggest the scope and pattern of German settlement in the state.

Other immigrant groups were served by their own national presses patterned on the German model. In 1847, when over half of the Norwegians in America lived in southeastern Wisconsin, the Nord-lyset was established in Racine County, the first American newspaper in the Norwegian language. The first Dutch language newspaper in the United States appeared in Sheboygan in 1849. At a later date, Polish, Italian, Yiddish and other immigrant groups read their own national papers, giving the Wisconsin press an international flavor rivaling even the largest urban centers.

The technological improvements in printing equipment and paper manufacture during the later nineteenth century revolutionized newspaper publication in America. An unwieldy flat-bed press was standard equipment in most offices until after the Civil War, when the more rapid Campbell Cylinder Press was introduced. The higher speed steam presses enabled publishers to increase circulations with no proportionate increase in personnel. But the limited market for the country weekly gave the urban daily the greater advantage in utilizing the new equipment. Likewise, typesetting was a hand operation in almost all weekly offices until well after 1900, for the linotype machine, invented in 1884, paid for itself more rapidly in volume production. The alliance of the linotype and the rotary press soon produced metropolitan papers of such complexity as to require an index for each daily edition.

The revolution in newspaper stock was no less complete than that of typographical mechanics. Newsprint before 1880 was made from rags; thereafter pine log pulp captured the market. The cheaper stock made for more newspapers, larger circulations, and larger formats—but poorer preservation of files. Only the recent introduction of microfilming has saved the older papers from complete disintegration. Huge tracts in northern Wisconsin that had been denuded to fill the ravenous demand for paper and lumber testified to the expansion of the press and the diminution of forest resources.

At the turn of the twentieth century Wisconsin was a state of lumber fortunes, obdurate railroads, discontented farmers, and political ferment. Many of the country weekly and foreign language papers joined the popular agitation and became unofficial organs of the agrarian movement as it developed through successive stages: Greenback, Granger, Populist, and Progressive.

La Follette's program of direct democracy, governmental reform, and regulation of business plucked responsive chords in the idealistic tradition of Wisconsin, and the press echoed the melody. Strident discord, however, was offered by some of the conservative metropolitan dailies. To drown the opposition, the progressive Republicans established their own daily paper, the Milwaukee Free Press, with the anomalous aid of millionaire Isaac Stephenson. Progressivism also met opposition from the Socialist Left. Victor Berger's Vorwaerts and Social Democratic Herald were influential in preventing the German population of Milwaukee from being solidly progressive.

The First World War put an unusual strain on Wisconsin's conscience, and the press was compelled to pick a tortuous path through the cross fire of blood-ties, ideological neutralism, and repressive patriotism. Most of the German papers broke under the burden. Many of them paid for their opposition to America's entry into the war with their mailing rights or padlocks on the plant door. All foreign language papers were suspect and were required to deposit translations with the postmaster until issued certificates of loyalty. Confined in a political vacuum, German papers ceased to run editorials or controversial news items. Anemic shadows of their former selves, they offered nothing more stimulating than society news and syndicated features. Fatally ill, the surviving members of Wisconsin's once proud and vigorous German press were absorbed by National Weeklies, Inc., a foreign language syndicate in Winona, Minnesota.

The early years of the twentieth century marked high water in newspaper publication in America; the flood began to ebb in Wisconsin after 1905. In that year 61 daily papers and 591 weeklies were issued in the state. Since then, higher postal rates, rising costs, and shifting social and economic patterns have forced many weeklies to choose between suspension and consolidation. They have found no successful way to compete with the professionalized city daily, or to capture a proportionate share of advertising revenue.

Successful newspaper publication has always depended on sufficient advertising, but the small-town merchant has regarded an "ad" in his local paper as a form of tribute rather than a retailing technique. He was confident that his townsmen knew what was available; besides, they had no means to trade elsewhere. When insufficient advertising was not fatal, it forced many editors to seek supplementary income outside the newspaper office.

The urbanization, standardization, and complexity of modern American life has made the country weekly of a previous generation hopelessly obsolete and without appeal to contemporary subscribers. The means of rapid delivery of city dailies removed the last vestige of the weekly's hold on the country reader. Those weeklies which have survived do so by sufferance of sentiment or by adopting the professional and business techniques of the daily wherever possible. The American weekly in its old age suffers the afflictions of stand-ardization and the rising competition of the impertinent juveniles of mass communications. Its files are its own monument to its greatness and its folly.

Even some city dailies have fallen victim to the same afflictions that felled their country cousins. One of the features of American journalism since 1890 has been the rise of large newspaper chains, such as the Scripps-Howard and Hearst enterprises. The movement was extended to Wisconsin when William Randolph Hearst purchased the Milwaukee Wisconsin News in 1918 and the Milwaukee Sentinel in 1924. Even when deliberate effort is made for originality, an impersonal and organizational paper cannot develop the personality of a country weekly whose editor is responsible only to his conscience and the mores of his community.

The cavalcade of the Wisconsin press is a colorful scene, stretching from the struggling Intelligencer to the mighty Milwaukee Journal. The parade includes the reportorial Times, the crusading Free Press, the vigilant Sentinel, the promotional Advocate, the pretentious Aegis, the political Democrat and Republican, and the pragmatic Zeitung. But they have not all marched into oblivion.

The most extensive collection of Wisconsin newspapers is held by the State Historical Society of Wisconsin. This collection was begun in 1854 by Lyman C. Draper, but for almost 100 years, until 1943, only a portion of the state's press was collected and preserved. However, since the Second World War a more ambitious collecting program includes almost all Wisconsin papers, now numbering 275 weeklies and 41 dailies. The Society's collections contain some 35,000 bound volumes and 20,000 reels of microfilm. In addition to the State Historical Society, many public libraries and county historical societies have collected and preserved newspaper files for their respective areas.

The Guide lists all newspapers published in Wisconsin from December 1833 to August 1957. Publications appearing in newspaper format, but which were primarily organs of agrarian organizations, educational institutions, religious groups, or trade unions have been excluded.

Newspapers are herein listed alphabetically: (1) by county, (2) by locality, and (3) by masthead title. In all cases, papers are listed under the current or last place of publication and in conformity with contemporary geographical designation. Under a given locality, papers are arranged alphabetically by the scheme established by Winifred Gregory in her American Newspapers, 1821-1936, the listing being governed by the first significant word of the masthead title, ignoring the place and frequency of publication. For example, under the City of Ashland the order would be: Ashland Journal, Weekly Leader, and Ashland Mirror. Consecutive entry numbers, to which the index refers, have been assigned to all listed titles. Cross-references have been made to all variant titles and publication localities, and such variants are noted in the main entry. Newspapers that transferred publication into, or outside of, the state have been listed under the last place of issue in Wisconsin.

The term "editors" has been used to apply to either editors or publishers. Whenever several names were carried on the masthead, those who significantly determined editorial policy have been selected for inclusion in the Guide.

All newspapers published in a foreign language have been so noted.

I am grateful for suggestions and encouragement to: Clifford L. Lord, Director of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin; Donald R. McNeil, Associate Director of the Society; Benton H. Wilcox, Librarian of the Society; John C. Jacques, Assistant to the Director; and to Rachel K. Schenk, Director of the University of Wisconsin Library School. My special thanks are due to O. Lawrence Burnette, Jr., Book Editor of the Society, whose criticism and suggestions have made the volume a more useful reference work. I also wish to thank the many librarians who submitted lists of newspaper files in their respective libraries.
